THE CASE OF THE PEEPING PHOTOGRAPHER

A.

Through the floor-to-ceiling windows of the building across the street from his, New York City photographer Arne Svenson watched his neighbors going about their daily routines – sipping coffee, reading the newspaper, napping. He saw a woman twirling her hair, illuminated by lamplight, and a dog gazing out the window at the busy street below. Svenson watched these activities with his camera, too, shooting dozens of pictures, many of which ended up in a gallery as a photo show called, you guessed it, The Neighbors.

B.

The neighbors themselves first learned of their starring roles in Svenson’s pictures after one couple happened upon a press review of Svenson’s show, which included images of the Fosters and their children, their faces and partially clad bodies easily recognizable. The photographs from Svenson’s show were on sale in New York City and Los Angeles galleries and on a photography website for as much as $7,500 a picture. Two weeks later, the Fosters sued Svenson explaining that he had violated their civil rights under the law, which states that a person’s name or portrait cannot be used for advertising or trade purposes without written consent.

C.

The Fosters asked the court to block Svenson from displaying and selling the images, asserting that they were ‘greatly frightened and angered’ by the unwanted publicity. They maintained that they were forced to keep their shades drawn during the day. Nearly three months after the Fosters sued, Manhattan Supreme Court Judge ruled that Arne Svenson’s work is art, which is considered free speech. The decision stated that Svenson didn’t need his neighbors’ permission to display and sell the photos of them. Svenson insisted he was not a Peeping Tom with a camera. ‘I am not photographing the residents as identifiable individuals but as representations of humankind,’ he told a reporter.

REMEMBER TO GET LOST

Being a businessman I spend a lot of time flying to various cities. Numerous airplanes, nervous queues at the airports, red-eye flights and continuous jet lags. I know it all by heart. A rush through the airport shopping mall, a coffee or two waiting for the boarding, a couple of hours in the air and back at home. Next month it starts all over again.

I have recently travelled to San Francisco for some meetings and found myself with a half day to kill. My options: The 49ers' first game of the season, against the Green Bay Packers. The America's Cup sailing races. Or I could get lost. 5.1. _____ I disappeared into the fog and clouds shrouding the Pacific Coast Highway and headed south with absolutely no destination in mind.

I drove through tunnels carved out of the mountains and stopped at a few state beaches; at one, I watched a wedding out on the cliffs among the crashing waves.

Back in the car, I drove toward San Gregorio, a town that you can easily miss. 5.2. _____ A few people milled around outside the San Gregorio General Store, smoking cigarettes and talking about the motorcycles they've owned over the years. Inside, I found a bar with regular patrons, a guitar duo, and, of course, a full-on store. 5.3. _____ Then I congratulated them, threw a couple of wrinkled dollars in their bucket, and walked back out into the world.

The day could have been so different – crammed into a stadium or bar half-watching sports. 5.4. _____ Then I was out on my own, having an unexpected and unrepeatable experience. I learned something that day. Don't be afraid to get lost – on purpose or otherwise – and have zero expectations. It will be good for you. I promise.

adapted from www.rd.com

- A. One quick decision and after a horrendously long line at the car rental center, I was free.
- B. I ordered coffee, grabbed a seat, and watched the guitarists jam out.
- C. Observing sports events has always had certain appeal – the sense of being a part of cheering crowd is something unique.
- D. But this was much more rewarding. Hours prior, I was on a flight with the masses, going through the motions.
- E. I know that because I drove right through it and ended up on a pine tree bordered ribbon of asphalt that felt like it would go on forever.

WHAT I REMEMBER

A long time ago, my father got some goats, a few rabbits, a rooster and a hen. My brother and I thought of them as pets. We liked to collect the eggs each day, and we loved it when the goats and rabbits had babies. My father used to sell the babies to other people who wanted pets for their children. I'll never forget the day I heard him talking to my mother. She was crying and saying things like, 'I didn't think it would come to this' and 'Don't talk about it in front of the children.' She told him she didn't want us to lose our childhood because of worrying. But I was already worried. I had overheard many of their conversations when they thought I was sleeping. I knew that my father was worried because many people were saying that there was going to be a second great drought. He said that if it happened again so soon, millions of people would starve. He said it was pretty clear that the drought had begun. He said that people didn't pay attention to the first great drought until it was too late.

Most of what they talked about was so confusing to me. They talked about how people should have known this would happen; that there was plenty of warning, but no one had really paid attention. I remember my father saying, 'When I look at the pictures in my great-grandfather's albums, I can't believe how rich they were, and how blue the sky was. It was like a paradise on earth, back then.'

They said that all the people who had argued for years about what to do, had caused this problem and that once the leaders failed us, there was nothing everyone else could do. I didn't really understand what that meant.

The other thing they talked about a lot was what that it was harder and harder to buy food. They talked about how everywhere in the world farmers were having terrible trouble growing the crops they used to grow. They said the changes in the weather were having a drastic impact on the growing season and that food was getting so expensive. That's why my father stopped selling the babies. He said we needed them for meat, but my mother hated the idea. She didn't want to eat animals that were our pets.

BRITISH RESIDENTS BLOCK ATTEMPTS TO PRODUCE CLEAN ENERGY

Britain has a difficult task: to generate 10% of its energy from renewable sources by 2020. So far, only 4.2% of energy is from renewable sources... and six years is not a long time to change it. The answer seems to be wind power: it's clean, it's fairly easy to produce, and it's as profitable as renewable energy can be. And there's an unlimited supply of wind in Britain. So what's the problem? The answer: Nimbys.

Nimbys are basically people who don't want anything dangerous, ugly or undesirable built near their house. Things such as prisons (fairly understandable), nuclear power stations (very understandable), rubbish dumps (50-50), or homeless shelters (a bit selfish). Now they are objecting to wind farms on the grounds that they are very big, very ugly, and a huge blight on the landscape.

Things had been looking very positive. The biggest and best wind farm project is the London Array. It's supposed to be the world's largest offshore wind farm with the building cost of £2bn and 271 wind turbines. It will be able to deliver 1,000 megawatts (MW) – enough to power 25% of all London. The wind farm itself will be 16 kilometres out to sea. The project has government approval, but it won't be going ahead. Why? Because of the Nimbys.

There are lots of other examples of Nimby obstruction. The county of Devon is a good case. It has set itself a target of generating 150MW, but so far has only approved 7MW of wind because small local councils keep obstructing every proposal. Wales has set itself a target of generating 800MW by 2010, but local council refusals mean only 217MW are operating.

The government response has been swift. They have promised new laws that will require local planning authorities to approve wind farms automatically. These new planning rules will weaken local residents' right to raise aesthetic objections to wind farm applications. So, in the future, there could be more and more of those great white wings on the horizon producing endless amounts of pollution-free energy... just as long as the Nimbys don't get in the way.

- A. presents a solution to the problem.
